A mix of exterior elements—board-and-batten siding, reclaimed beams, metal and synthetic shingle roofing, oversized doors—helps give this 5,000-square-foot residence, built for relaxation and entertaining, the look of a barn. The interior is open-concept on all four levels, including a “secret” loft accessed by a ladder located inside one of two bunkrooms. The designers chose concrete floors in the lower-level garage and carried them throughout the house to impart an industrial look. A floating staircase delivers guests to the main level, where the living room, dining room, bar, and kitchen are located, and a stone wall spanning the length of the house serves as the home’s focal point. Exposed beams provide structural support while adding to the desired barn vibe. Oversized windows look out on country views.
